(OS) OCCUPY D.C. DEMONSTRATOR THREW A BOTTLE, NOT A BRICK

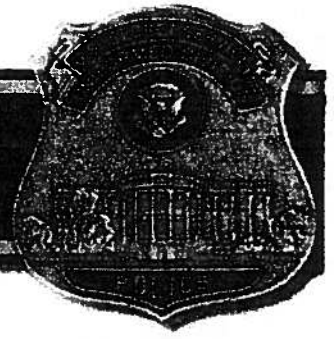

Authorities in Washington now say a demonstrator at an Occupy Washington encampment threw a liquid-filled soda bottle, not a brick, hitting a U.S. Park Police officer after police began removing tents over the weekend. Court documents available Monday say the demonstrator, Jeremiah Desausa, threw the Coke bottle Saturday. Authorities say he resisted arrest and was subdued with a Taser. He later said he hadn't intended to hit anyone. Authorities had previously said the object thrown was a brick. The court document describing the incident says the officer hit by the bottle has a serious eye injury. Doctors told him they will not know if he suffered permanent eye damage until swelling and bleeding subside. Interior and National Park Service officials issued a statement commending officers during the Occupy demonstrations.

POLICE BRIEF – 5/1/2012

(OS) OCCUPY MOVEMENT PREPARES FOR NATIONWIDE GENERAL STRIKE

Occupy Wall Street organizers plan hundreds of marches, strikes and teach-ins in 120 cities around the country on Tuesday for what they call a "general strike" for economic justice. May Day protesters from New York labor unions, immigrants groups and others are expected to march from Union Square to Wall Street on Tuesday for "A Day without the 99 Percent." New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg has said that law enforcement is ready to manage what is expected to be a day of wide-ranging demonstrations throughout the city, including possible bridge and tunnel blockades, dozens of smaller pickets and a "pop-up" occupation of Bryant Park across the street from the headquarters of Bank of America. Officials in other cities, such as Seattle, have warned of the possibility of vandalism and violence. Other big actions are planned for the West Coast, including a large march in the San Francisco Bay area. Organizers said a plan to shut down the Golden Gate Bridge has been scrapped. Locally, members of Occupy D.C. plan a festival and rally at Meridian Hill Park beginning at 3:30 p.m., followed by a 6:30 march from the park to the White House. Marchers plan to head down 14th Street to New York Avenue to the White House. A D.C. police spokesman said they have no plans to shut down lanes of traffic to accommodate them. Occupiers have called Tuesday their "coming out party" and the start of their spring resurgence, after the cold weather lull that followed the eviction of dozens of Occupy camps across the country in the late fall and winter. Source: Washington Post

The NY Times reported on a similar story with the following additional information, "The May Day actions will kick off other demonstrations, most notably around the North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit meeting in Chicago. Some 28 world leaders are expected at the NATO gathering on May 20. Antiwar groups and other protesters had hoped for a chance to have multiple protests while the world's eyes are on Chicago, when it was first announced that a Group of 8 meeting would precede the NATO conference. But President Barack Obama has moved that the G-8 summit meeting to Camp David, the presidential retreat in Maryland. Occupy supporters will also head there."

POLICE BRIEF – 2/29/2012

(OS) OCCUPY DC PROTESTERS ARRESTED OUTSIDE MONSANTO

Occupy DC said 12 of its members were arrested Wednesday while protesting outside the offices of agriculture giant Monsanto as part of a national day to "shut down the corporations." The group was protesting in solidarity with Occupy Portland, which called for a national day of action to shut down corporations with ties to the American Legislative Exchange Council. According to Occupy Portland's Call to Action statement, ALEC "is a prime example of the way corporations buy off legislators and craft legislation that serves the interests of corporations and not people." D.C. Police Officer William Farr said early Wednesday that about 50 people came to Monsanto's offices at 13th and I streets and tried to block off the doors. Farr said that the protesters were on public space and that people who work in the building were able to enter it. But later, protesters blocked the doors to the building - forming a line around all entrances - and scuffled with police outside, Occupiers said on Twitter. Police threatened demonstrators with arrest if they did not move from the doors, eventually taking a dozen protesters into custody, Occupiers said. Ten were arrested for blocking the entrance. Two others were charged with crossing a police line.

(OS) PARK SERVICE REMINDS PROTESTERS OF CAMPING BAN

U.S. Park Police reminded demonstrators at two Washington sites where Occupy protesters have been demonstrating for months of a no-camping rule. There were no arrests. Sgt. David Schlosser, a Park Police spokesman, said officers had begun enforcing the camping ban Monday by reminding demonstrators of the regulation. He said some demonstrators had already done so, although he didn't know how many. He declined to discuss a timeline for eviction, though he said the camping ban pertained not only to sleeping on the grounds but also to possessing bedding materials like blankets. Protesters on Monday hung a blue tarp over a statue in McPherson Square. The National Park Service warned protesters Friday at McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza that those who violate the camping rule will be subject to arrest.

(OS) OCCUPY D.C. TENTS REMAIN UP

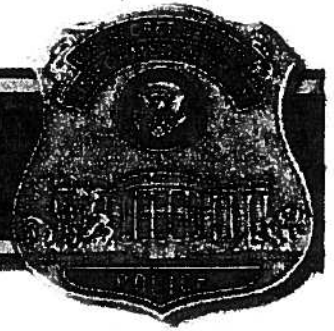

Lots of Occupy D.C. protesters and their tents remain downtown Tuesday, a day after the deadline that made it illegal to camp at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square. The protesters spent the night awake, in what one protester calls the "tent of dreams" draped over the statue of General McPherson. It's what the protester tells WTOP's Neal Augenstein is a final act of defiance. Sgt. David Schlosser, a Park Police spokesman, said officers had begun enforcing the camping ban Monday by reminding demonstrators of the regulation. He said some demonstrators had already done so, although he didn't know how many. He declined to discuss a timeline for eviction, though he said the camping ban pertained not only to sleeping on the grounds but also to possessing bedding materials like blankets. Some Occupy protesters have been bracing for a possible confrontation since Friday, after learning they had to stop camping. On Monday, U.S. Park Police did not arrest anyone and enforced no evictions. A 9:30 a.m. court hearing will address whether the protesters have the right to continue camping in D.C.

(OS) PARK SERVICE SAYS OCCUPY CAMPING MUST END

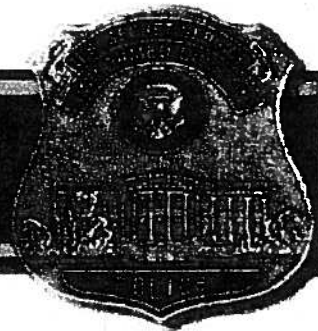

U.S. Park Police plan to begin enforcing a no-camping rule at two Washington sites where Occupy protesters have been demonstrating for months. The National Park Service has warned the protesters Friday at McPherson Square and at Freedom Plaza that those who violate the camping rule beginning Monday at noon will be subject to arrest. Protesters have said they intend to stay at the two sites and defend their encampments. The National Park Service distributed fliers Friday to protesters at McPherson Square on K Street and Freedom Plaza on Pennsylvania Avenue. The notice said protesters must comply with regulations that prohibit camping at those sites. The park service has said it has a history of accommodating 24-hour vigils and protests. During an emergency meeting held Friday night, the protesters planned a "sleep strike" starting 11 a.m. Monday. Some protesters believe they can get around the regulation by not sleeping, or simply ditching their sleeping gear. Other occupiers say they are willing to risk arrest, or are thinking about deliberately being arrested. "We've been here for three and a half months, and we're going to keep up our protests," says one protester. Others say they are thinking about moving to other occupy camps, or will just look for other places to stay. The new move comes after a House oversight subcommittee hearing last week where Republican lawmakers questioned why camping has been allowed since October. National Park Service Director Jonathan Jarvis said protesters have a right to be in the park and won't be evicted, but they will be encouraged to sleep elsewhere. In the flier, the park service defines camping as using park land for "living accommodation purposes such as sleeping." It says camping materials must be removed and temporary structures must be left open to allow for inspection. Protester John Penley, who joined the Freedom Plaza occupation after protesting last fall in New York's Zuccotti Park as part of the Occupy Wall Street movement, said protesters will defend both Washington encampments at the federally controlled parks on Monday. "We're not going away," he said, "and we've got people coming from other areas to support us."

(OS) GRAY WANTS OCCUPY D.C. OUT OF MCPHERSON SQUARE

D.C. Mayor Vincent Gray is calling for the Occupy D.C. encampment to be kicked out of McPherson Square because of health and safety concerns. In a letter to the National Park Service first reported by the Washington Post, Gray points to problems with rats, communicable disease, hypothermia and food borne illness. In bold, underlined text, the mayor says that "at a minimum" the Occupy D.C. sites should be consolidated at Freedom Plaza. Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., issued a statement echoing Gray's concerns. He has asked the park service to justify how the protesters have been allowed to camp in the square. Issa says the park service is "making excuses." Park Service spokesman Bill Line says not much is likely to change. "First Amendment rights and political free speech rights are what are at issue here, and we have rulings from the U.S. Supreme Court here that apply specifically to the District of Columbia," Line says. "We, as any other federal agency, have to abide by what the Supreme Court tells us."

(OS) COPS SHIFTED FROM NEIGHBORHOODS TO PATROL OCCUPY

The union representing District police said Wednesday that officers are being pulled from neighborhood patrols and reassigned to monitor the Occupy DC protests and that crime has increased in the city since the Occupiers arrived three months ago. The Fraternal Order of Police's Metropolitan Police Department Labor Committee wrote to Mayor Vincent Gray Wednesday demanding that he correct statements he's made about the Occupy movement, specifically that he "wasn't sure" crime was up in the District and that he "didn't know of a situation" where a neighborhood had been neglected during Occupy protests. Gray made the statements during a Dec. 15 interview with NewsChannel 8. The union contends that violent crime increased by 17 percent in the District and overall crime by 14 percent in the 30 days prior to Dec. 15. The union also attached to its letter to Gray a series of "deployment accountability logs," which show that officers from other districts or shifts were redeployed to McPherson Square to deal with the Occupiers. It's not clear whether the increase in crime in the District can be attributed to Occupy DC.

(OS) SEVEN OCCUPY DC PROTESTERS ARRESTED OUTSIDE WHITE HOUSE

U.S. Park Police arrested seven Occupy DC protesters outside the White House Tuesday night after they sat on the sidewalk and refused to move when police asked them to leave. The Occupiers were protesting a section in the National Defense Authorization Act of 2012 that they say permits the indefinite detention of terror suspects regardless of their nationality. Many said they wouldn't vote for President Obama unless he vetoed the bill. About 25 protesters marched in a circle outside the White House until police told them to move behind a police line they'd set up between two light poles. There were about 25 U.S. Park Police on scene. This was the latest of three consecutive protests against the NDAA outside the White House this week; 11 were arrested at a protest Monday night. Protester Marshall Scott said the group plans to continue the nightly protests until Obama vetoes the bill.

(OS) DOZENS OF OCCUPY D.C. MEMBERS ARRESTED

Police brought in an airbag, an armored truck and a cherry picker to arrest dozens of protesters at the McPherson Square Occupy D.C. camp following a 10-hour standoff over a wooden structure. Protesters refused to leave or dismantle a wood structure they built Saturday night. By Monday morning, the structure at 17th and I Streets was taken down. Protesters say they are uncertain of what civil disobedience may occur in the District Monday. Late Sunday evening, police used the cherry picker to force down the remaining protesters who had taken up positions on the roof. The last man, named David, was taken down after a struggle with police, shortly after 8:30 p.m.

(OS) 'OCCUPY THE HIGHWAY' MARCHERS TO REACH D.C.

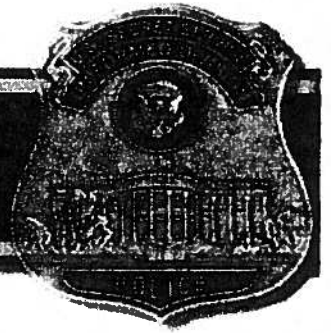

About two dozen Occupy Wall Street participants are expected to arrive in the nation's capital after a two-week, 240-mile march from New York. The protest is known as "Occupy the Highway," and it picked up a few additional participants as the marchers made their way through New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland. The marchers are hoping to arrive at the Occupy D.C. encampment in McPherson Square sometime Tuesday. Their arrival in Washington was planned to coincide with an announcement by the congressional deficit-reduction supercommittee on possible cuts and tax increases. Organizer Kelley Brannon says the failure of the supercommittee to reach a deal only strengthens the protesters' message that Congress is not addressing the concerns of middle- and lower-income Americans.

(U)POTENTIAL TRAFFIC DELAYS AROUND THE KEY BRIDGE AND MCPHERSON SQUARE

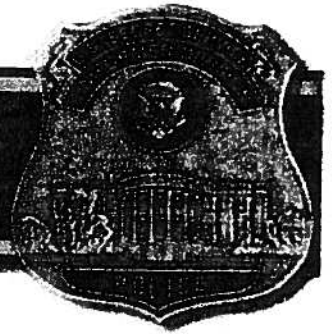

The District Department of Transportation (DDOT) and the Metropolitan Police Department (MPD) would like to advise the public about the possibility of traffic delays during the evening rush hour tomorrow. Occupy DC has announced that on Thursday, November 17, 2011, between the hours of 2:30 PM and continuing through the evening rush hour, they plan to conduct a demonstration/march between the Key Bridge and McPherson Square. Because any demonstration within Washington, DC always presents the possibility of causing traffic delays, the Department of Transportation and the Metropolitan Police Department urge motorists to be aware of the possibility of heavy pedestrian and motor vehicle traffic between the Key Bridge, McPherson Square, and surrounding areas.

(OS) OCCUPY DC MARCHERS INVITE OBAMA JOIN PROTESTS

More than 300 protesters marched on the White House to invite an absent President Barack Obama to side with the Occupy movement, after police raids on camps in New York and other cities. "We would like to welcome him to the movement," chanted the energetic but peaceful crowd from Occupy DC, amplifying a statement from a young male protester at the front of the procession. Recalling that Occupy DC is situated in nearby McPherson Square, the marchers – mostly unaware that the US president was, at that very hour, flying to Australia – shouted: "We're just down the street! Join us!" Unlike New York and other major US cities, Washington has been tolerant of not one, but two encampments that are home to protesters decrying social inequality and what they say is excessive corporate influence on US politics. Local police escorted Tuesday's march through evening rush hour traffic, and just two uniformed Secret Service agents were in position along the black iron fence on the north side of the White House when the protesters turned up.

(OS) Police: Occupy San Francisco protesters attack officers

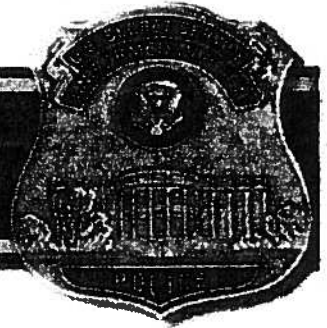

One San Francisco police officer was slashed by a razor and another had his uniform torn and cheek cut in a clash with Occupy San Francisco protesters Saturday afternoon, police said. At around 3:30 p.m., near the Embarcadero and Broadway, police officers attempted to prevent marching demonstrators from blocking the intersection where MUNI light rail tracks were located. A female protester emerged from the crowd and an "exacto razor blade attached to a pen or pencil-like object," San Francisco police said in an e-mail. "The female slashed the inside of the officers hand and ran back into the crowd before the officer had time to realize he was cut," police said. In a second incident, a protester grabbed an officer's police radio and ran back into the crowd. As the officer attempted to retrieve it, a second protester blocked the officer and tore his uniform and cut his cheek, police said. Both injured officers were treated and released at the scene. No one has been arrested.

(OS) 'OCCUPY WALL STREET' PROTESTERS TO MARCH TO D.C.

A group of "Occupy Wall Street" protesters will embark Wednesday on a two-week march from New York to Washington, D.C. The "Occupy The Highway" protesters are set to leave from New York's Liberty Square at noon and march on foot to the capital, covering an average 20 miles a day for the next two weeks. They aim to reach Washington, D.C., by Nov. 23 – when a congressional committee will be deciding whether or not to uphold Bush-era tax cuts. "We feel it's imperative for OWS [Occupy Wall Street] to respect and participate in the historical significance of long distance marches to support, promote and encourage economic and human equality," they added on the "Occupy The Highway" blog. The protesters will be walking from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. each day – what they call "banker hours." They will be stopping at several towns and cities on their way to the capital including, Philadelphia, Newark and Baltimore, where they hope people will join their protest. Source: MyfoxNY

(OS) POLICE WILL GET TOUGH ON 'OCCUPY D.C.' PROTESTERS

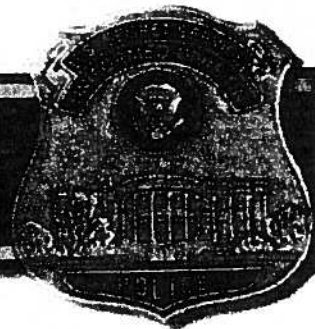

Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier said Monday that her department is adjusting its tactics in response to Occupy D.C.'s "increasingly confrontational and violent" demonstrations, following the actions of other U.S. cities looking to evict — or at least crack down — on what officials are characterizing as unruly protesters. The chief's tough talk changed the tone of what had been about a month of congenial relations between protesters and authorities. It came after a Friday night incident in which several people attending a downtown event where the protesters were demonstrating were hurt. "Five people that we are aware of were injured," Chief Lanier said in a statement issued Monday. "That is no longer a peaceful protest." Chief Lanier's statement also included links to videos that police say support their claims that the protesters are becoming more aggressive. In one video, protesters appear to use children to block an entrance. "We do not condone nor will we tolerate violence or aggression," Chief Lanier said. "The administration will do what's necessary to maintain order in the city and to ensure that everyone is safe." Occupy D.C. organizers disputed Chief Lanier's response in an email statement of their own, calling her charges against them "false." "There is no evidence to show that protesters directly caused any injuries to anyone. The injuries cited by police were perpetrated by others against peaceful Occupy DC protesters — making today's police statement all the more dishonest," protest organizers said in the email. Chief Lanier did not elaborate on how the department might adjust its tactics. The weekend incident in the District unfolded about 10 p.m. Friday when Occupy D.C. protesters, who have been camping in McPherson Square, demonstrated outside the Walter E. Washington Convention Center where the Americans for Prosperity group was holding its "Defending the American Dream" summit. Protesters say police refused to arrest a Maryland man for striking multiple demonstrators with his car Friday night and did not collect witness statements from at least two of the victims. Police dispute the protesters' account. Chief Lanier said the demonstrators have become "increasingly confrontational and violent toward uninvolved bystanders and motorists." About 50 protesters marched to police headquarters in Northwest on Monday waving a police report they said supports their account of the incidents. They were met by roughly 30 police officers, who guarded the entrance to police headquarters as protesters shouted that they were not armed and they were only demanding their right to freedom of speech. "Ohio resident Heidi Sippel, who said she was injured on Friday, asked officers, 'Is there someone who can answer my questions,' before she, her family and attorney were allowed inside to give their official statements. The demonstrators who remained outside for the 90-minute confrontation held signs with messages such as 'Don't be too hard on the cops: They're 1 layoff away from joining us' and 'hit + run is not an accident.'" When Ms. Sippel returned outside, she told the crowd that the investigation into the weekend's incident was still open and that "everybody was friendly" inside the department. The small crowd applauded when it heard the news that police had opened the investigation into what happened on Friday. The protesters left police headquarters and marched toward City Hall. "They've been respectful of us," said Occupy D.C. protester Sam Jewier. "They've escorted us on marches and we appreciate all they've done. What's violent about this?" Source: Washington Times

(U) ARMED CITIZEN MILITIA SHOWS UP AT OCCUPY PHOENIX

Armed citizen militia group U.S. Border Guard is making its presence felt at the Occupy Phoenix demonstration to protect free speech rights, arguing that the second amendment prevents the State from abusing the first amendment. The group has been labeled "neo-Nazis" by the Southern Poverty Law Center, which is usually a demonization tactic, but the individual shown in the clip, "JT Ready" has attended neo-Nazi rallies and is closely affiliated with the fringe National Socialist Party. The group has also operated as a "Minutemen on Steroids" outfit, organizing armed patrols of the U.S. border with Mexico.

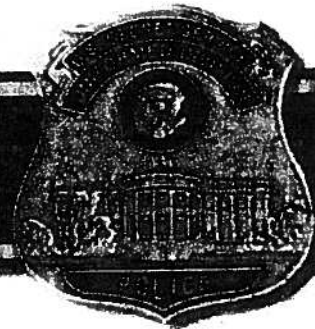

Analyst Note: According to their website, they plan on attending other "Occupy Protest" across the country.

(OS) POLICE WORRY AS WALL STREET PROTESTORS PINE FOR WORLD SERIES SPOTLIGHT

The Occupy Wall Street movement may make a move this week on the World Series. Facebook chatter from the protestors suggests they are casting their eyes on Busch Stadium, coveting the national media spotlight surrounding the series. Among the ideas floated among group members online: A massive rally, pitching tents around Busch Stadium or sending a streaker onto the field during the game "to send a message." St. Louis Police Major Lawrence O'Toole says police will uphold the protestors' Constitutional rights of assembly and free speech, but he's concerned about a "lone wolf" causing trouble. "There are times that we know that there are certain elements that can get drawn into large protests and other people who have other agendas," O'Toole said. "So far, the Occupy St. Louis protestors have kept a peaceful vigil in Kiener Plaza, several blocks from Busch Stadium. A core group of about 20 to 30 have been spending the night in tents. Last week they were joined by hundreds of labor protestors to march through the streets of downtown. There were no arrests at the march, and so far only ten protestors have been arrested for "violating the park curfew." Police know of no threat against the World Series, but are working with the Secret Service to provide heightened security. The St. Louis Cardinals report they are still awaiting word from the Secret Service and Major League Baseball about what security restrictions fans may encounter with First Lady Michelle Obama attending Wednesday night's game. Cards spokesman Ron Watermon says he expects it to be "much less invasive than a Presidential visit." But Watermon says there will be some additional security measures. How they will affect fans is unclear. The ballpark will be open three hours ahead of the game on Wednesday to give everyone enough time to get inside.

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

Figure 1

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99 percentors" and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top 1 percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot of the King of England in 1604.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC.

Participants

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. They work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age."

Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

As of October 21, the Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, has received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by NYPD during the march down streets in Manhattan.

On September 22, demonstrators connected with a Labor Union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other Labor Unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

On September 30, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross the Brooklyn Bridge in New York.

On October 5, unspecified numbers of Labor Union members gathered to support the movement. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 11, 6 protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

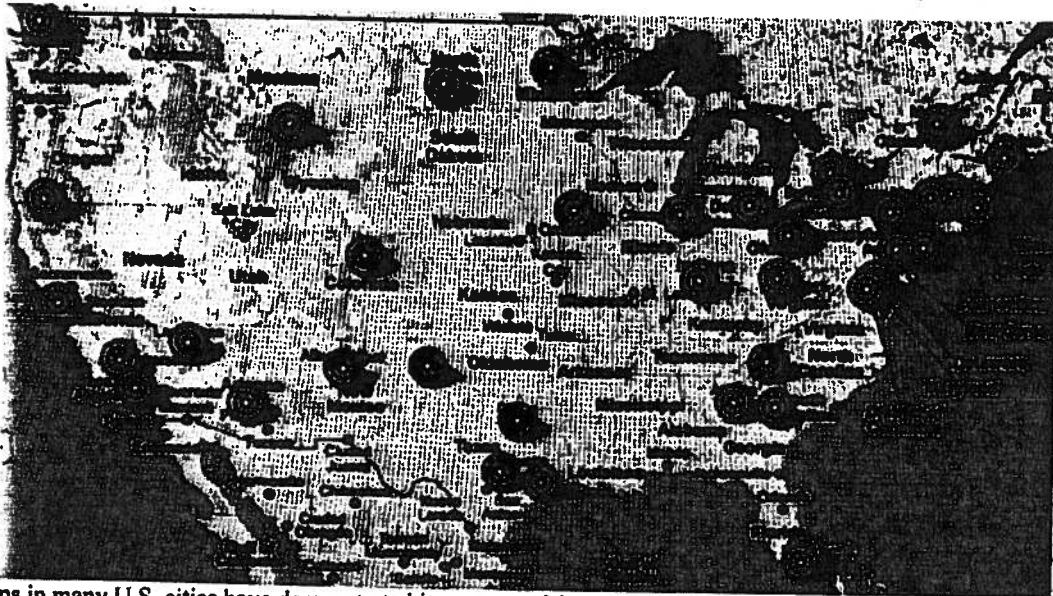

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

On October 15, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange. Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

Conclusion

As of October 21, 951 cities in 82 countries will have held an Occupy Movement rally or have scheduled one for sometime in October 2011. Demonstrators have protested or scheduled protests in nearly every state in America. The primary themes of Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign at protected sites involving high profile protectees.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of a political activist Kevin Zeese, who worked for Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activists leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message.

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99 percentors" and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top 1 percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot of the King of England in 1604.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and heated national debate about the demonstrations.

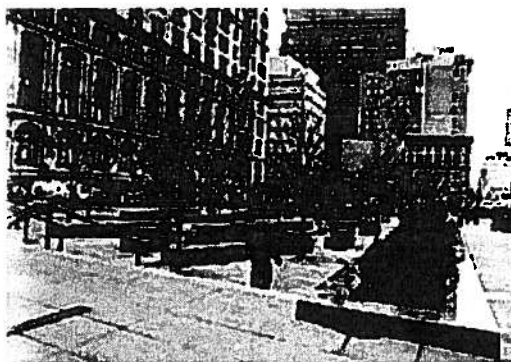

On November 2, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day. (An English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.)

On November 10, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

The Occupy Wall Street website announced protestors would shut down Wall Street on Thursday, November 17, in response to the raid on Zuccotti Park. Threats of violent behavior, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, saying they would burn down New York City.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In Washington, DC, Oscar Ramiro Ortega-Hernandez was charged with attempting to assassinate President Obama after he fired rifle shots at the White House. Law enforcement believed he mingled with Occupy DC protestors before his capture.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested or scheduled protests in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Local and national politicians have been pressured in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have skirted making a decision. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC would be the most difficult, since the decision rests with National Park Service, who has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If Zuccotti Park, which is privately owned, is closed to protestors, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of a political activist Kevin Zeese, for a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

their message. The primary themes of Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Open source information indicated Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican National Convention and Democratic National Convention. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.

Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, WDC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many WDC lobby firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. MPD arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested or scheduled protests in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC would be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through January 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If Zuccotti Park, which is privately owned, is closed to protestors, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC.

Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Open source information indicated Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican National Convention and Democratic National Convention. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99 percentors" and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top 1 percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot of the King of England in 1605.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC.

Participants

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. According to their website, they work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age." Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill

McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

The Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of political activist Kevin Zeese, a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

Timeline

On September 17, 2011, 1,000 people demonstrated during the 66th United Nations General Assembly and in conjunction with the U.S. Day of Rage, a gathering inspired by the Arab Spring to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by the New York City Police Department (NYPD) during their march through the streets of lower Manhattan. Protestors gathered at Zuccotti Park, a privately-owned public area near Wall Street, as a base of operations.

On September 22, demonstrators connected with a labor union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other labor unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

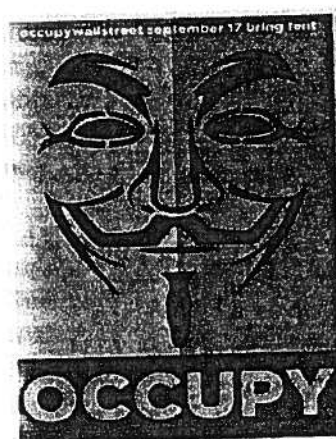

On September 30, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

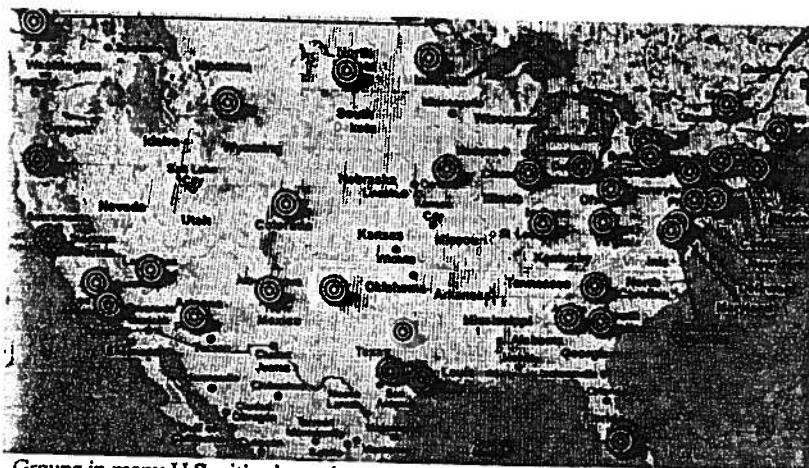

On October 11, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange. Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day—an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC may be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through January 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If other Occupy protests are shut-down, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of the Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Open source information indicated Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican National Convention and Democratic National Convention. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99 percentors" and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top one percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot targeting the King of England in 1605.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square in Washington, DC through January 2012.

On December 28, 2011, the National Park Service granted a new permit to members of the Occupy Movement to stay at Freedom Plaza through February 28, 2012. However, the protestors will have to share the space with the National Center for Public Policy Research, a

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. According to their website, they work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age." Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

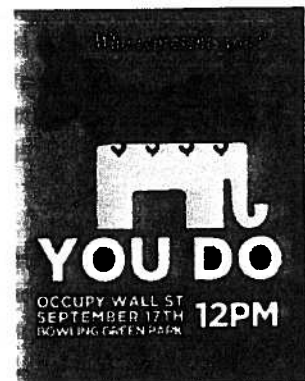

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

The Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of political activist Kevin Zeese, a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

Other camps across the country were disbanded by city officials; however, the two groups in Washington, DC continue to occupy public space. The group at Freedom Plaza, formerly known as Stop the Machine, changed its name to Occupy Washington, DC. This group is very similar but not the same as Occupy DC, which occupies McPherson Square.

Following the closure of several Occupy Movement camps, most notably at Zuccotti Park in New York City, more protestors bolstered the ranks at the two locations in Washington, DC.

Timeline

On September 17, 2011, 1,000 people demonstrated during the 66th United Nations General Assembly and in conjunction with the U.S. Day of Rage, a gathering inspired by the Arab Spring to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by the New York City Police Department (NYPD) during their march through the streets of lower Manhattan. Protestors gathered at Zuccotti Park, a privately-owned public area near Wall Street, as a base of operations.

On September 22, demonstrators connected with a labor union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other labor unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

On September 30, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

On October 11, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange. Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day - an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, Washington, DC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many Washington, DC lobbyist firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. The Washington Metropolitan Police (MPD) arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

In December 2011, open source media reported on November 30, two members of Occupy Tampa posed as a couple and wore evening attire to gain entry to a 2012 U.S. presidential candidate Mitt Romney fundraiser at the Tampa Museum of Art. Upon gaining entry, the couple shouted, "Shame, Shame!!" until security forced them to leave. One of the protestors initially resisted and yelled, "Look at this crowd! Multiply it by 3,000. Welcome to the (2012) RNC." Neither was arrested and the protests continued outside the venue.

On December 18, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors after they unsuccessfully attempted to chain themselves to a fence at the White House.

On December 20, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested seven protestors for failure to obey an order following a demonstration with 50 individuals at the White House.

On December 30, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors for wearing masks during a demonstration with nine individuals at the White House.

In late-December 2011, Zuccotti Park was cleared by New York City officials for cleaning. Protestors were allowed back without tents, sleeping bags, and other amenities to stay overnight. Following this mandate, very few protestors attempted to create a presence in the park.

On January 4, 2012, media reports indicated many of the tents erected at Freedom Plaza were left vacant by protestors over the holidays. Some of the remaining protestors told the media cold temperatures and class division led to the decreasing numbers at the site.

Other media reports stated Occupy DC at McPherson Square faces safety and health concerns not only from the cold temperatures but from numerous sightings of rats. These concerns could force city officials to urge closing of the camp.

On January 5, 2012, Occupy Washington, DC announced to the media they were expanding their efforts in the winter towards a massive "American Spring." This is a reference to the Arab Spring of 2010, in which civil resistance and social networking media were used to topple governments in the Middle East and North Africa. They stated two houses, one in Washington, DC, and one in Maryland, were designated for special projects including the production of an unspecified television show. Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC."

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Open source information indicated Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican National Convention and Democratic National Convention. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.

Members of the Occupy Movement claimed they would have a strong presence during the Iowan Republican caucuses on January 3, 2012. Some political pundits speculated the Occupy Movement could generate similar political impact to the Tea Party in 2010. However, media reports indicated the Occupy Movement protestors had little impact and did not go further than heckling the candidates. Occupy Movement members pledged to stage protests in New Hampshire and South Carolina during the presidential nomination process.

Protestors affiliated with the Occupy Movement claimed they filed a permit on December 28, 2011 to protest at the National Mall in Washington, DC on January 17, 2012 as part of an event called "Occupy Congress." Although the National Park Service stated they have not received the application, a copy was posted on the group's social networking media site.

Based on the Occupy Washington DC announcement to the media on January 5, 2012, protestors are committed to maintaining a presence in Washington DC for 2012. The Occupy Movement groups in Washington, DC continue to receive donations, private contributions, and assistance from local Washington DC health and safety organizations. Zeese, a political activist with the group, said 2012 is the international year of the co-op, and they would focus on "creating worker-owned co-operatives to provide income to occupiers and funding for the movement." Protestors continue to use social networking media to ask for help and affirm their position to stay at the camps.

On January 27, 2012, the National Park Service notified protestors they will not be allowed to camp or use temporary structures at either Freedom Plaza or McPherson Square and must vacate the premises before January 30. The flyer, approved after a Congressional meeting on Tuesday, stated, "Although 24/7 demonstration vigils and the use of symbolic temporary structures, including empty tents used as symbols of the demonstration, may be permitted in the park areas, camping and the use of temporary structures for camping is not." Occupy Movement protestors told the media they would not leave quietly.

On October 6, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

On October 11, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange. Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day - an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, Washington, DC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many Washington, DC lobbyist firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. The Washington Metropolitan Police (MPD) arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

In December 2011, open source media reported on November 30, two members of Occupy Tampa posed as a couple and wore evening attire to gain entry to a 2012 U.S. presidential candidate Mitt Romney fundraiser at the Tampa Museum of Art. Upon gaining entry, the couple shouted, "Shame, Shame!!" until security forced them to leave. One of the protestors initially resisted and yelled, "Look at this crowd! Multiply it by 3,000. Welcome to the (2012) RNC." Neither was arrested and the protests continued outside the venue.

On December 18, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors after they unsuccessfully attempted to chain themselves to a fence at the White House.

On December 20, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested seven protestors for failure to obey an order following a demonstration with 50 individuals at the White House.

On December 30, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors for wearing masks during a demonstration with nine individuals at the White House.

In late-December 2011, Zuccotti Park was cleared by New York City officials for cleaning. Protestors were allowed back without tents, sleeping bags, and other amenities to stay overnight. Following this mandate, very few protestors attempted to create a presence in the park.

On January 4, 2012, media reports indicated many of the tents erected at Freedom Plaza were left vacant by protestors over the holidays. Some of the remaining protestors told the media cold temperatures and class division led to the decreasing numbers at the site.

Other media reports stated Occupy DC at McPherson Square faces safety and health concerns, not only from the cold temperatures but from numerous sightings of rats. These concerns could force city officials to urge closing of the camp.

On January 5, 2012, Occupy Washington, DC announced to the media they were expanding their efforts in the winter towards a massive "American Spring." This is a reference to the Arab Spring of 2010, in which civil resistance and social networking media were used to topple governments in the Middle East and North Africa. They stated two houses, one in Washington, DC, and one in Maryland, were designated for special projects including the production of an unspecified television show. Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC," scheduled to begin on March 30, 2012, as a combination of music, education, and resistance mobilizing people from across the nation.

On December 28, 2011, ten protestors were arrested in Des Moines, Iowa outside Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's campaign office. The protestors demanded Romney and Wells Fargo Bank release their tax returns and return campaign contributions.

On January 17, 2012, approximately 1500 protestors marched from the U.S. Supreme Court to the White House. Two individuals attempted to jump the fence line before falling back to the ground. Video footage of protestors showed an unknown individual throw a smoke device over the fence. Responders cleared the device and declared the area safe. Two packages were also left unattended and declared safe by responders.

On January 24, 2012, 80 protestors demonstrated near the White House during President Obama's 2012 State of the Union Address.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC may be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through February 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If the remaining Occupy protests are shut-down, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of the Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Members of the Occupy Movement claimed they would have a strong presence during the Iowan Republican caucuses on January 3, 2012. Some political pundits speculated the Occupy Movement could generate similar political impact to the Tea Party in 2010. However, media reports indicated the Occupy Movement protestors had little impact and did not go further than heckling the candidates. Occupy Movement members pledged to stage protests in New Hampshire and South Carolina during the presidential nomination process.

Based on the Occupy Washington DC announcement to the media on January 5, 2012, protestors are committed to maintaining a presence in Washington DC for 2012. The Occupy Movement groups in Washington, DC continue to receive donations, private contributions, and assistance from local Washington DC health and safety organizations. Zeese, a political activist with the group, said 2012 is the international year of the co-op, and they would focus on "creating worker-owned co-operatives to provide income to occupiers and funding for the movement." Protestors continue to use social networking media to ask for help and affirm their position to stay at the camps.

On January 26, 2012, Adbusters emailed over 90,000 subscribers to their website and magazine with a message targeting the G8 and NATO summits scheduled for May 2012. The message called for people from all over the world to converge on Chicago and advertise their exploits via the twitter "#OCCUPYCHICAGO." Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican National Convention and Democratic National Convention. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99 " and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top one percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot targeting the King of England in 1605.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square in Washington, DC through January 2012.

On December 28, 2011, the National Park Service granted a new permit to members of the Occupy Movement to stay at Freedom Plaza through February 28, 2012. However, the protestors will have to share the space with the National Center for Public Policy Research, a free-market think tank planning pro-capitalist activities to counter the Occupy Movement message in February.

On January 27, 2012, the National Park Service notified protestors they will not be allowed to camp or use temporary structures at either Freedom Plaza or McPherson Square and must vacate the premises before January 30. The flyer, approved after a Congressional meeting on Tuesday, stated, "Although 24/7 demonstration vigils and the use of symbolic temporary structures, including empty tents used as symbols of the demonstration, may be permitted in the park areas, camping and the use of temporary structures for camping is not." Occupy Movement protestors told the media they would not leave quietly.

On January 30, 2012, the National Park Service announced they were pushing back the deadline to cease camping at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square to January 31, 2012.

Participants

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. According to their website, they work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age." Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

The Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of political activist Kevin Zeese, a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

Other camps across the country were disbanded by city officials; however, the two groups in Washington, DC continue to occupy public space. The group at Freedom Plaza, formerly known as Stop the Machine, changed its name to Occupy Washington, DC. This group is very similar, but not the same as Occupy DC, which occupies McPherson Square.

Following the closure of several Occupy Movement camps, most notably at Zuccotti Park in New York City, more protestors bolstered the ranks at the two locations in Washington, DC.

Timeline

On September 17, 2011, 1,000 people demonstrated during the 66th United Nations General Assembly and in conjunction with the U.S. Day of Rage, a gathering inspired by the Arab Spring to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by the New York City Police Department (NYPD) during their march through the streets of lower Manhattan. Protestors gathered at Zuccotti Park, a privately-owned public area near Wall Street, as a base of operations.

On September 22, 2011, demonstrators connected with a labor union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other labor unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 2011, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

On September 30, 2011, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 2011, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, 2011, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, 2011, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC," scheduled to begin on March 30, 2012, as a combination of music, education, and resistance mobilizing people from across the nation.

On January 17, 2012, approximately 1,500 protestors marched from the U.S. Supreme Court to the White House. Two individuals attempted to jump the fence line before falling back to the ground. Video footage of protestors showed an unknown individual throw a smoke device over the fence. Responders cleared the device and declared the area safe. Two packages were also left unattended and declared safe by responders.

On January 24, 2012, 80 protestors demonstrated near the White House during President Obama's 2012 State of the Union Address.

On January 28, 2012, Occupy Oakland staged a large "move in day" protest. The protestors attempted to "occupy" the vacant Henry J. Kaiser Convention Center and the Oakland Museum of California, but were ordered to disperse and several arrests were made at each site. Later that evening, large crowds gathered outside an Oakland YMCA, where clashes with the Oakland Police Department escalated and officers were pelted with bottles, metal pipes, rocks, spray cans, and burning flares. Officers responded with tear gas and began arresting demonstrators. Around the same time as the YMCA protest, Occupy Oakland demonstrators broke into Oakland City Hall and smashed display cases, graffitied walls, cut electrical wires, and burned an American flag. By the end of the day, approximately 400 protestors were arrested. Occupy Oakland organizers condemned police actions and claim to be organizing a "day of action" against the arrests on February 6, 2012.

As a result of these events, approximately 300 demonstrators in New York City marched in support of Occupy Oakland.

On the same day, hundreds of Occupy DC protestors gathered outside the annual Alfalfa Club dinner in Washington, DC, to demonstrate against the perceived injustices of DC's "power brokers." The protestors heckled guests and threw glitter on Senator Joe Lieberman as he arrived for the dinner.

On January 29, 2012, U.S. Park Police officers were handing out fliers about the January 30 deadline to cease overnight camping in McPherson Square when a male protestor became angry and confronted the officers. One Park Police officer used a Taser to subdue the individual after he would not comply with police orders. The individual was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace after he was taken to George Washington Hospital.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC may be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through February 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If the remaining Occupy protests are shut-down, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of the Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Members of the Occupy Movement claimed they would have a strong presence during the Iowan Republican caucuses on January 3, 2012. Some political pundits speculated the Occupy Movement could generate similar political impact to the Tea Party in 2010. However, media reports indicated the Occupy Movement protestors had little impact and did not go further than heckling the candidates. Occupy Movement members pledged to stage protests in New Hampshire and South Carolina during the presidential nomination process.

Based on the Occupy Washington DC announcement to the media on January 5, 2012, protestors are committed to maintaining a presence in Washington DC for 2012. The Occupy Movement groups in Washington, DC continue to receive donations, private contributions, and assistance from local Washington DC health and safety organizations. Zeese, a political activist with the group, said 2012 is the international year of the co-op, and they would focus on "creating worker-owned co-operatives to provide income to occupiers and funding for the movement." Protestors continue to use social networking media to ask for help and affirm their position to stay at the camps.

On January 26, 2012, Adbusters emailed over 90,000 subscribers to their website and magazine with a message targeting the G8 and NATO summits scheduled for May 2012. The message called for people from all over the world to converge on Chicago and advertise their exploits via the twitter "#OCCUPYCHICAGO." Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99 " and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top one percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot targeting the King of England in 1605.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square in Washington, DC through January 2012.

On December 28, 2011, the National Park Service granted a new permit to members of the Occupy Movement to stay at Freedom Plaza through February 28, 2012. However, the protestors will have to share the space with the National Center for Public Policy Research, a free-market think tank planning pro-capitalist activities to counter the Occupy Movement message in February.

On January 27, 2012, the National Park Service notified protestors they will not be allowed to camp or use temporary structures at either Freedom Plaza or McPherson Square and must vacate the premises before January 30. The flyer, approved after a Congressional meeting on Tuesday, stated, "Although 24/7 demonstration vigils and the use of symbolic temporary structures, including empty tents used as symbols of the demonstration, may be permitted in the park areas, camping and the use of temporary structures for camping is not." Occupy Movement protestors told the media they would not leave quietly.

On January 30, 2012, the National Park Service announced they were pushing back the deadline to cease camping at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

On February 4, 2012, the National Park Service authorized the U.S. Park Police to commence enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

Participants

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. According to their website, they work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age." Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

The Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of political activist Kevin Zeese, a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

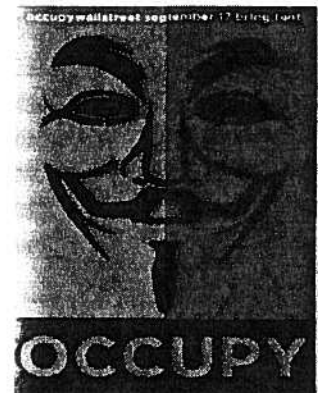

Other camps across the country were disbanded by city officials; however, the two groups in Washington, DC continue to occupy public space. The group at Freedom Plaza, formerly known as Stop the Machine, changed its name to Occupy Washington, DC. This group is very similar, but not the same as Occupy DC, which occupies McPherson Square.

Following the closure of several Occupy Movement camps, most notably at Zuccotti Park in New York City, more protestors bolstered the ranks at the two locations in Washington, DC.

Timeline

On September 17, 2011, 1,000 people demonstrated during the 66th United Nations General Assembly and in conjunction with the U.S. Day of Rage, a gathering inspired by the Arab Spring to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by the New York City Police Department (NYPD) during their march through the streets of lower Manhattan. Protestors gathered at Zuccotti Park, a privately-owned public area near Wall Street, as a base of operations.

On September 22, 2011, demonstrators connected with a labor union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other labor unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 2011, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

On September 30, 2011, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 2011, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, 2011, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, 2011, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, 2011, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 2011, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

On October 11, 2011, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 2011 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, 2011, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange.

Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, 2011, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, 2011, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, 2011, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day - an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, 2011, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, 2011, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, Washington, DC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many Washington, DC lobbyist firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. The Washington Metropolitan Police (MPD) arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

In December 2011, open source media reported on November 30, two members of Occupy Tampa posed as a couple and wore evening attire to gain entry to a 2012 U.S. presidential candidate Mitt Romney fundraiser at the Tampa Museum of Art. Upon gaining entry, the couple shouted, "Shame, Shame!!" until security forced them to leave. One of the protestors initially resisted and yelled, "Look at this crowd! Multiply it by 3,000. Welcome to the (2012) RNC." Neither was arrested and the protests continued outside the venue.

On December 18, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors after they unsuccessfully attempted to chain themselves to a fence at the White House.

On December 20, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested seven protestors for failure to obey an order following a demonstration with 50 individuals at the White House.

On December 28, 2011, ten protestors were arrested in Des Moines, Iowa outside Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's campaign office. The protestors demanded Romney and Wells Fargo Bank release their tax returns and return campaign contributions.

On December 30, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors for wearing masks during a demonstration with nine individuals at the White House.

In late-December 2011, Zuccotti Park was cleared by New York City officials for cleaning. Protestors were allowed back without tents, sleeping bags, and other amenities to stay overnight. Following this mandate, very few protestors attempted to create a presence in the park.

On January 4, 2012, media reports indicated many of the tents erected at Freedom Plaza were left vacant by protestors over the holidays. Some of the remaining protestors told the media cold temperatures and class division led to the decreasing numbers at the site.

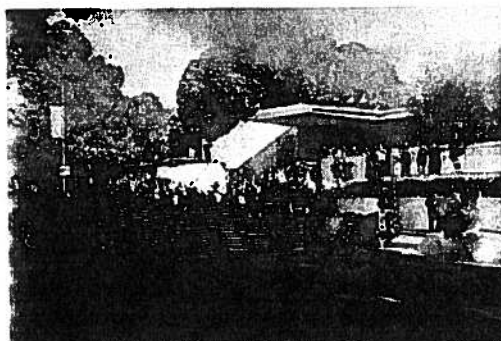

Other media reports stated Occupy DC at McPherson Square faces safety and health concerns, not only from the cold temperatures but from numerous sightings of rats. These concerns could force city officials to urge closing of the camp.

On January 5, 2012, Occupy Washington, DC announced to the media they were expanding their efforts in the winter towards a massive "American Spring." This is a reference to the Arab Spring of 2010, in which civil resistance and social networking media were used to topple governments in the Middle East and North Africa. They stated two houses, one in Washington, DC, and one in Maryland, were designated for special projects including the production of an unspecified television show. Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC," scheduled to begin on March 30, 2012, as a combination of music, education, and resistance mobilizing people from across the nation.

On January 17, 2012, approximately 1,500 protestors marched from the U.S. Supreme Court to the White House. Two individuals attempted to jump the fence line before falling back to the ground. The individual was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace after he was taken to George Washington Hospital.

On February 4, 2012, U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of overnight camping restrictions at McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza. Park Police seized any camp equipment found on the site and removed the tents in which the equipment was found. Law enforcement sources reported seeing Occupy DC members in possession of numerous urine and bleach-filled condoms and bags containing human feces.

Inspections were suspended later that day and approximately twenty-five officers were scheduled to remain overnight to monitor and enforce regulations. Park Police arrested eleven individuals for failure to obey a lawful order, crossing a police line, resisting arrest, assaulting a police officer, simple assault, and felony assault on a police officer. One Park Police officer was struck in the head with a brick by a protestor and sustained non-life threatening injuries during the operation.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99 " and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top one percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot targeting the King of England in 1605.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square in Washington, DC through January 2012.

On December 28, 2011, the National Park Service granted a new permit to members of the Occupy Movement to stay at Freedom Plaza through February 28, 2012. However, the protestors will have to share the space with the National Center for Public Policy Research, a free-market think tank planning pro-capitalist activities to counter the Occupy Movement message in February.

On January 27, 2012, the National Park Service notified protestors they will not be allowed to camp or use temporary structures at either Freedom Plaza or McPherson Square and must vacate the premises before January 30. The flyer, approved after a Congressional meeting on Tuesday, stated, "Although 24/7 demonstration vigils and the use of symbolic temporary structures, including empty tents used as symbols of the demonstration, may be permitted in the park areas, camping and the use of temporary structures for camping is not." Occupy Movement protestors told the media they would not leave quietly.

On January 30, 2012, the National Park Service announced they were pushing back the deadline to cease camping at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

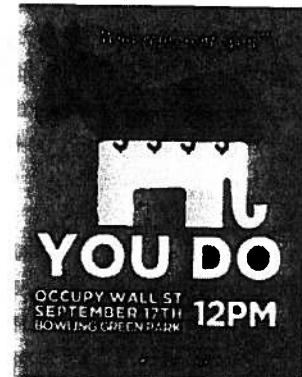

On February 4, 2012, the National Park Service authorized the U.S. Park Police to commence enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

Participants

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. According to their website, they work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age." Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

The Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of political activist Kevin Zeese, a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

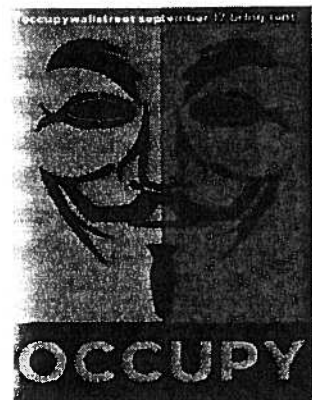

Other camps across the country were disbanded by city officials; however, the two groups in Washington, DC continue to occupy public space. The group at Freedom Plaza, formerly known as Stop the Machine, changed its name to Occupy Washington, DC. This group is very similar, but not the same as Occupy DC, which occupies McPherson Square.

Following the closure of several Occupy Movement camps, most notably at Zuccotti Park in New York City, more protestors bolstered the ranks at the two locations in Washington, DC.

Timeline

On September 17, 2011, 1,000 people demonstrated during the 66th United Nations General Assembly and in conjunction with the U.S. Day of Rage, a gathering inspired by the Arab Spring to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by the New York City Police Department (NYPD) during their march through the streets of lower Manhattan. Protestors gathered at Zuccotti Park, a privately-owned public area near Wall Street, as a base of operations.

On September 22, 2011, demonstrators connected with a labor union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other labor unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 2011, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

On September 30, 2011, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 2011, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, 2011, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, 2011, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, 2011, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 2011, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

On October 11, 2011, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 2011 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, 2011, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange.

Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, 2011, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, 2011, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, 2011, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day - an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, 2011, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, 2011, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, Washington, DC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many Washington, DC lobbyist firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. The Washington Metropolitan Police (MPD) arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

In December 2011, open source media reported on November 30, two members of Occupy Tampa posed as a couple and wore evening attire to gain entry to a 2012 U.S. presidential candidate Mitt Romney fundraiser at the Tampa Museum of Art. Upon gaining entry, the couple shouted, "Shame, Shame!!" until security forced them to leave. One of the protestors initially resisted and yelled, "Look at this crowd! Multiply it by 3,000. Welcome to the (2012) RNC." Neither was arrested and the protests continued outside the venue.

On December 18, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors after they unsuccessfully attempted to chain themselves to a fence at the White House.

On December 20, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested seven protestors for failure to obey an order following a demonstration with 50 individuals at the White House.

On December 28, 2011, ten protestors were arrested in Des Moines, Iowa outside Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's campaign office. The protestors demanded Romney and Wells Fargo Bank release their tax returns and return campaign contributions.

On December 30, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors for wearing masks during a demonstration with nine individuals at the White House.

In late-December 2011, Zuccotti Park was cleared by New York City officials for cleaning. Protestors were allowed back without tents, sleeping bags, and other amenities to stay overnight. Following this mandate, very few protestors attempted to create a presence in the park.

On January 4, 2012, media reports indicated many of the tents erected at Freedom Plaza were left vacant by protestors over the holidays. Some of the remaining protestors told the media cold temperatures and class division led to the decreasing numbers at the site.

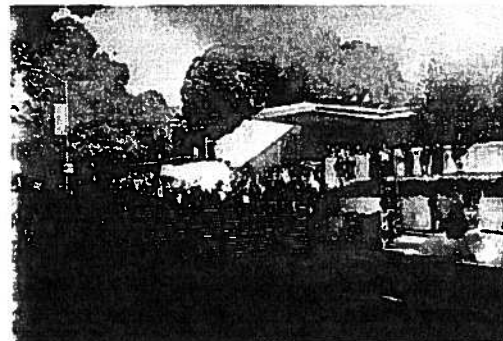

Other media reports stated Occupy DC at McPherson Square faces safety and health concerns, not only from the cold temperatures but from numerous sightings of rats. These concerns could force city officials to urge closing of the camp.

On January 5, 2012, Occupy Washington, DC announced to the media they were expanding their efforts in the winter towards a massive "American Spring." This is a reference to the Arab Spring of 2010, in which civil resistance and social networking media were used to topple governments in the Middle East and North Africa. They stated two houses, one in Washington, DC, and one in Maryland, were designated for special projects including the production of an unspecified television show. Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC," scheduled to begin on March 30, 2012, as a combination of music, education, and resistance mobilizing people from across the nation.

On January 17, 2012, approximately 1,500 protestors marched from the U.S. Supreme Court to the White House. Two individuals attempted to jump the fence line before falling back to the ground. Video footage of protestors showed an unknown individual throw a smoke device over the fence. Responders cleared the device and declared the area safe. Two packages were also left unattended and declared safe by responders.

On January 24, 2012, 80 protestors demonstrated near the White House during President Obama's 2012 State of the Union Address.

On January 28, 2012, Occupy Oakland staged a large "move in day" protest. The protestors attempted to "occupy" the vacant Henry J. Kaiser Convention Center and the Oakland Museum of California, but were ordered to disperse and several arrests were made at each site. Later that evening, large crowds gathered outside an Oakland YMCA, where clashes with the Oakland Police Department escalated and officers were pelted with bottles, metal pipes, rocks, spray cans, and burning flares. Officers responded with tear gas and began arresting demonstrators. Around the same time as the YMCA protest, Occupy Oakland demonstrators broke into Oakland City Hall and smashed display cases, graffitied walls, cut electrical wires, and burned an American flag. By the end of the day, approximately 400 protestors were arrested. Occupy Oakland organizers condemned police actions and claim to be organizing a "day of action" against the arrests on February 6, 2012.

As a result of these events, approximately 300 demonstrators in New York City marched in support of Occupy Oakland.

On the same day, hundreds of Occupy DC protestors gathered outside the annual Alfalfa Club dinner in Washington, DC, to demonstrate against the perceived injustices of DC's "power brokers." The protestors heckled guests and threw glitter on Senator Joe Lieberman as he arrived for the dinner.

On January 29, 2012, U.S. Park Police officers were handing out fliers about the January 30th deadline to cease overnight camping in McPherson Square when a male protestor became angry and confronted the officers. One Park Police officer used a Taser to subdue the individual after he would not comply with police orders. The individual was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace after he was taken to George Washington Hospital.

On February 4, 2012, U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of overnight camping restrictions at McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza. Park Police seized any camp equipment found on the site and removed the tents in which the equipment was found.

Inspections were suspended later that day and approximately twenty-five officers were scheduled to remain overnight to monitor and enforce regulations and no further incidents were reported. Park Police arrested eleven individuals for failure to obey a lawful order, crossing a police line, resisting arrest, assaulting a police officer, simple assault and felony assault on a police officer. One Park Police officer was struck in the head with a brick by a protestor and sustained non-life threatening injuries during the operation.

On February 5, 2012, the U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza. One individual was arrested for threatening a police officer. Park Police scheduled eighteen officers to remain overnight to monitor and enforce regulations and no further incidents were reported.

Upon completion of the enforcement action, protestors were allowed to return to McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000).

Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC may be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through February 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If the remaining Occupy protests are shut-down, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of the Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Members of the Occupy Movement claimed they would have a strong presence during the Iowan Republican caucuses on January 3, 2012. Some political pundits speculated the Occupy Movement could generate similar political impact to the Tea Party in 2010. However, media reports indicated the Occupy Movement protestors had little impact and did not go further than heckling the candidates. Occupy Movement members pledged to stage protests in New Hampshire and South Carolina during the presidential nomination process.

Based on the Occupy Washington DC announcement to the media on January 5, 2012, protestors are committed to maintaining a presence in Washington DC for 2012. The Occupy Movement groups in Washington, DC continue to receive donations, private contributions, and assistance from local Washington DC health and safety organizations. Zeese, a political activist with the group, said 2012 is the international year of the co-op, and they would focus on "creating worker-owned co-operatives to provide income to occupiers and funding for the movement." Protestors continue to use social networking media to ask for help and affirm their position to stay at the camps.

On January 26, 2012, Adbusters emailed over 90,000 subscribers to their website and magazine with a message targeting the G8 and NATO summits scheduled for May 2012. The message called for people from all over the world to converge on Chicago and advertise their exploits via the twitter "#OCCUPYCHICAGO." Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican and Democratic National Conventions. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.

On January 27, 2012, the National Park Service notified protestors they will not be allowed to camp or use temporary structures at either Freedom Plaza or McPherson Square and must vacate the premises before January 30. The flyer, approved after a Congressional meeting on Tuesday, stated, "Although 24/7 demonstration vigils and the use of symbolic temporary structures, including empty tents used as symbols of the demonstration, may be permitted in the park areas, camping and the use of temporary structures for camping is not." Occupy Movement protestors told the media they would not leave quietly.

On January 30, 2012, the National Park Service announced they were pushing back the deadline to cease camping at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

On February 4, 2012, the National Park Service authorized the U.S. Park Police to commence enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

Participants

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. According to their website, they work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age." Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

The Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of political activist Kevin Zeese, a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

Other camps across the country were disbanded by city officials; however, the two groups in Washington, DC continue to occupy public space. The group at Freedom Plaza, formerly known as Stop the Machine, changed its name to Occupy Washington, DC. This group is very similar, but not the same as Occupy DC, which occupies McPherson Square.

Following the closure of several Occupy Movement camps, most notably at Zuccotti Park in New York City, more protestors bolstered the ranks at the two locations in Washington, DC.

Timeline

On September 17, 2011, 1,000 people demonstrated during the 66th United Nations General Assembly and in conjunction with the U.S. Day of Rage, a gathering inspired by the Arab Spring to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by the New York City Police Department (NYPD) during their march through the streets of lower Manhattan. Protestors gathered at Zuccotti Park, a privately-owned public area near Wall Street, as a base of operations.

On September 22, 2011, demonstrators connected with a labor union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other labor unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 2011, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

On September 30, 2011, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 2011, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, 2011, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, 2011, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, 2011, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 2011, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

On October 11, 2011, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 2011, 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, 2011, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange.

Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, 2011, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, 2011, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, 2011, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day - an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, 2011, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, 2011, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, Washington, DC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many Washington, DC lobbyist firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. The Washington Metropolitan Police (MPD) arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

In December 2011, open source media reported on November 30, two members of Occupy Tampa posed as a couple and wore evening attire to gain entry to a 2012 U.S. presidential candidate Mitt Romney fundraiser at the Tampa Museum of Art. Upon gaining entry, the couple shouted, "Shame, Shame!!" until security forced them to leave. One of the protestors initially resisted and yelled, "Look at this crowd! Multiply it by 3,000. Welcome to the (2012) RNC." Neither was arrested and the protests continued outside the venue.

On December 18, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors after they unsuccessfully attempted to chain themselves to a fence at the White House.

On December 20, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested seven protestors for failure to obey an order following a demonstration with 50 individuals at the White House.

On December 28, 2011, ten protestors were arrested in Des Moines, Iowa outside Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's campaign office. The protestors demanded Romney and Wells Fargo Bank release their tax returns and return campaign contributions.

On December 30, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors for wearing masks during a demonstration with nine individuals at the White House.

In late-December 2011, Zuccotti Park was cleared by New York City officials for cleaning. Protestors were allowed back without tents, sleeping bags, and other amenities to stay overnight. Following this mandate, very few protestors attempted to create a presence in the park.

On January 4, 2012, media reports indicated many of the tents erected at Freedom Plaza were left vacant by protestors over the holidays. Some of the remaining protestors told the media cold temperatures and class division led to the decreasing numbers at the site.

Other media reports stated Occupy DC at McPherson Square faces safety and health concerns, not only from the cold temperatures but from numerous sightings of rats. These concerns could force city officials to urge closing of the camp.

On January 5, 2012, Occupy Washington, DC announced to the media they were expanding their efforts in the winter towards a massive "American Spring." This is a reference to the Arab Spring of 2010, in which civil resistance and social networking media were used to topple governments in the Middle East and North Africa. They stated two houses, one in Washington, DC, and one in Maryland, were designated for special projects including the production of an unspecified television show. Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC," scheduled to begin on March 30, 2012, as a combination of music, education, and resistance mobilizing people from across the nation.

On January 17, 2012, approximately 1,500 protestors marched from the U.S. Supreme Court to the White House. Two individuals attempted to jump the fence line before falling back to the ground. Video footage of protestors showed an unknown individual throw a smoke device over the fence. Responders cleared the device and declared the area safe. Two packages were also left unattended and declared safe by responders.

On January 24, 2012, 80 protestors demonstrated near the White House during President Obama's 2012 State of the Union Address.

On January 28, 2012, Occupy Oakland staged a large "move in day" protest. The protestors attempted to "occupy" the vacant Henry J. Kaiser Convention Center and the Oakland Museum of California, but were ordered to disperse and several arrests were made at each site. Later that evening, large crowds gathered outside an Oakland YMCA, where clashes with the Oakland Police Department escalated and officers were pelted with bottles, metal pipes, rocks, spray cans, and burning flares. Officers responded with tear gas and began arresting demonstrators. Around the same time as the YMCA protest, Occupy Oakland demonstrators broke into Oakland City Hall and smashed display cases, graffitied walls, cut electrical wires, and burned an American flag. By the end of the day, approximately 400 protestors were arrested. Occupy Oakland organizers condemned police actions and claim to be organizing a "day of action" against the arrests on February 6, 2012.

As a result of these events, approximately 300 demonstrators in New York City marched in support of Occupy Oakland.

On the same day, hundreds of Occupy DC protestors gathered outside the annual Alfalfa Club dinner in Washington, DC, to demonstrate against the perceived injustices of DC's "power brokers." The protestors heckled guests and threw glitter on Senator Joe Lieberman as he arrived for the dinner.

On January 29, 2012, U.S. Park Police officers were handing out fliers about the January 30th deadline to cease overnight camping in McPherson Square when a male protestor became angry and confronted the officers. One Park Police officer used a Taser to subdue the individual after he would not comply with police orders. The individual was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace after he was taken to George Washington Hospital.

On February 4, 2012, U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of overnight camping restrictions at McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza. Park Police seized any camp equipment found on the site and removed the tents in which the equipment was found.

Inspections were suspended later that day and approximately 25 officers were scheduled to remain overnight and monitor and enforce regulations. U.S. Park Police arrested 11 individuals for failure to obey a lawful order, crossing a police line, resisting arrest, assaulting a police officer, simple assault, and felony assault on a police officer. One Park Police officer was struck in the head with a brick by a protestor and sustained non-life threatening injuries during the operation.

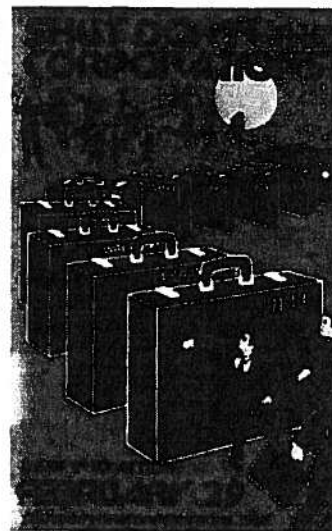

On February 5, 2012, the U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza. One individual was arrested for threatening a police officer. Park Police scheduled 18 officers to remain overnight to monitor and enforce regulations. No further incidents were reported.

Upon completion of the enforcement action, protestors were allowed to return to McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza.

On February 14, 2012, the FBI advised an Occupy Movement affiliated event, Shut Down the Corporations, was scheduled to occur nationwide on February 29, 2012. The group's website called for non-violent, direct action against members of the American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) to "reclaim our ability to make the decisions that affect our lives." The group claimed corporations and the government suppressed and silenced their collective voices emphasizing foreclosure, unemployment, lack of health care, and environment destruction. The website lists ALEC member businesses and cities and recommended tactics such as blockades, boycotts, sit-ins, and other types of protest.

The website specifically mentions the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) headquarters located in downtown Washington, DC as a target for direct action.

In March 2012, Occupy Movement websites and open source media reported group members and affiliates intended to protest major events throughout the year. They specifically mentioned G8/NATO Summits, Republican National Convention, and Democratic National Conventions. Occupy Movement leaders instructed members to use certain keywords to link their social networking communications. Several groups claiming Occupy Movement connections list protests for a variety of interests with many only indirectly connected to the original Occupy Movement message of anti-corruption.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000). Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC may be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through February 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If the remaining Occupy protests are shut-down, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of the Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Members of the Occupy Movement claimed they would have a strong presence during the Iowan Republican caucuses on January 3, 2012. Some political pundits speculated the Occupy Movement could generate similar political impact to the Tea Party in 2010. However, media reports indicated the Occupy Movement protestors had little impact and did not go further than heckling the candidates. Occupy Movement members pledged to stage protests in New Hampshire and South Carolina during the presidential nomination process.

Based on the Occupy Washington DC announcement to the media on January 5, 2012, protestors are committed to maintaining a presence in Washington DC for 2012. The Occupy Movement groups in Washington, DC continue to receive donations, private contributions, and assistance from local Washington DC health and safety organizations. Zeese, a political activist with the group, said 2012 is the international year of the co-op, and they would focus on "creating worker-owned co-operatives to provide income to occupiers and funding for the movement." Protestors continue to use social networking media to ask for help and affirm their position to stay at the camps.

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99" and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top one percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot targeting the King of England in 1605.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square in Washington, DC through January 2012.

On December 28, 2011, the National Park Service granted a new permit to members of the Occupy Movement to stay at Freedom Plaza through February 28, 2012. However, the protestors will have to share the space with the National Center for Public Policy Research, a free-market think tank planning pro-capitalist activities to counter the Occupy Movement message in February.

The flyer, approved after a Congressional meeting on Tuesday, stated, "Although 24/7 demonstration vigils and the use of symbolic temporary structures, including empty tents used as symbols of the demonstration, may be permitted in the park areas, camping and the use of temporary structures for camping is not." Occupy Movement protestors told the media they would not leave quietly.

On January 30, 2012, the National Park Service announced they were pushing back the deadline to cease camping at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

On February 4, 2012, the National Park Service authorized the U.S. Park Police to commence enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

On September 30, 2011, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 2011, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, 2011, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, 2011, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, 2011, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 2011, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

On October 11, 2011, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 2011, 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, 2011, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange.

Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, 2011, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, 2011, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, 2011, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day - an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, 2011, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, 2011, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, Washington, DC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many Washington, DC lobbyist firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. The Washington Metropolitan Police (MPD) arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

In December 2011, open source media reported on November 30, two members of Occupy Tampa posed as a couple and wore evening attire to gain entry to a 2012 U.S. presidential candidate Mitt Romney fundraiser at the Tampa Museum of Art. Upon gaining entry, the couple shouted, "Shame, Shame!!" until security forced them to leave. One of the protestors initially resisted and yelled, "Look at this crowd! Multiply it by 3,000. Welcome to the (2012) RNC." Neither was arrested and the protests continued outside the venue.

On December 18, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors after they unsuccessfully attempted to chain themselves to a fence at the White House.

On December 20, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested seven protestors for failure to obey an order following a demonstration with 50 individuals at the White House.

On December 28, 2011, ten protestors were arrested in Des Moines, Iowa outside Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's campaign office. The protestors demanded Romney and Wells Fargo Bank release their tax returns and return campaign contributions.

On December 30, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors for wearing masks during a demonstration with nine individuals at the White House.

In late-December 2011, Zuccotti Park was cleared by New York City officials for cleaning. Protestors were allowed back without tents, sleeping bags, and other amenities to stay overnight. Following this mandate, very few protestors attempted to create a presence in the park.

On January 4, 2012, media reports indicated many of the tents erected at Freedom Plaza were left vacant by protestors over the holidays. Some of the remaining protestors told the media cold temperatures and class division led to the decreasing numbers at the site.

Other media reports stated Occupy DC at McPherson Square faces safety and health concerns, not only from the cold temperatures but from numerous sightings of rats. These concerns could force city officials to urge closing of the camp.

On January 5, 2012, Occupy Washington, DC announced to the media they were expanding their efforts in the winter towards a massive "American Spring." This is a reference to the Arab Spring of 2010, in which civil resistance and social networking media were used to topple governments in the Middle East and North Africa. They stated two houses, one in Washington, DC, and one in Maryland, were designated for special projects including the production of an unspecified television show. Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC," scheduled to begin on March 30, 2012, as a combination of music, education, and resistance mobilizing people from across the nation.

On January 17, 2012, approximately 1,500 protestors marched from the U.S. Supreme Court to the White House. Two individuals attempted to jump the fence line before falling back to the ground. Video footage of protestors showed an unknown individual throw a smoke device over the fence. Responders cleared the device and declared the area safe. Two packages were also left unattended and declared safe by responders.

On January 24, 2012, 80 protestors demonstrated near the White House during President Obama's 2012 State of the Union Address.

On January 28, 2012, Occupy Oakland staged a large "move in day" protest. The protestors attempted to "occupy" the vacant Henry J. Kaiser Convention Center and the Oakland Museum of California, but were ordered to disperse and several arrests were made at each site. Later that evening, large crowds gathered outside an Oakland YMCA, where clashes with the Oakland Police Department escalated and officers were pelted with bottles, metal pipes, rocks, spray cans, and burning flares. Officers responded with tear gas and began arresting demonstrators. Around the same time as the YMCA protest, Occupy Oakland demonstrators broke into Oakland City Hall and smashed display cases, graffitied walls, cut electrical wires, and burned an American flag. By the end of the day, approximately 400 protestors were arrested. Occupy Oakland organizers condemned police actions and claim to be organizing a "day of action" against the arrests on February 6, 2012.

As a result of these events, approximately 300 demonstrators in New York City marched in support of Occupy Oakland.

On the same day, hundreds of Occupy DC protestors gathered outside the annual Alfalfa Club dinner in Washington, DC, to demonstrate against the perceived injustices of DC's "power brokers." The protestors heckled guests and threw glitter on Senator Joe Lieberman as he arrived for the dinner.

On January 29, 2012, U.S. Park Police officers were handing out fliers about the January 30th deadline to cease overnight camping in McPherson Square when a male protestor became angry and confronted the officers. One Park Police officer used a Taser to subdue the individual after he would not comply with police orders. The individual was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace after he was taken to George Washington Hospital.

On February 4, 2012, U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of overnight camping restrictions at McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza. Park Police seized any camp equipment found on the site and removed the tents in which the equipment was found.

Inspections were suspended later that day and approximately 25 officers were scheduled to remain overnight and monitor and enforce regulations. U.S. Park Police arrested 11 individuals for failure to obey a lawful order, crossing a police line, resisting arrest, assaulting a police officer, simple assault, and felony assault on a police officer. One Park Police officer was struck in the head with a brick by a protestor and sustained non-life threatening injuries during the operation.

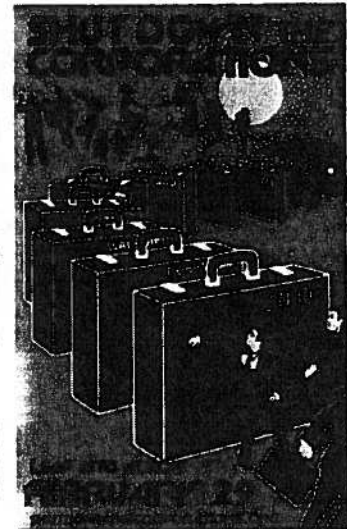

On February 5, 2012, the U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza. One individual was arrested for threatening a police officer. Park Police scheduled 18 officers to remain overnight to monitor and enforce regulations. No further incidents were reported.

Upon completion of the enforcement action, protestors were allowed to return to McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza.

On February 14, 2012, the FBI advised an Occupy Movement affiliated event, Shut Down the Corporation, was scheduled to occur on February 23, 2012. The group's website called for non-violent direct action against members of the American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) to "assert our ability to make the decisions that affect our lives." The group claimed corporations and the government suppressed and abused their collective voices emphasizing foreclosure, unemployment, lack of health care, and environment destruction. The website lists ALEC member businesses and cities and recommended tactics such as blockades, boycotts, sit-ins, and other types of protest.

The website specifically mentions the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) Headquarters located in downtown Washington, DC as a target for direct action.

In March 2012, Occupy Movement websites and open source media reported group members and affiliates intended to protest major events throughout the year. They specifically mentioned G8/NATO Summits, Republican National Convention, and Democratic National Conventions. Occupy Movement leaders instructed members to use certain keywords to link their social networking communications. Several groups claiming Occupy Movement connections list protests for a variety of interests with many only indirectly connected to the original Occupy Movement message of anti-corruption.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000). Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC may be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through February 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If the remaining Occupy protests are shut-down, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of the Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Members of the Occupy Movement claimed they would have a strong presence during the Iowan Republican caucuses on January 3, 2012. Some political pundits speculated the Occupy Movement could generate similar political impact to the Tea Party in 2010. However, media reports indicated the Occupy Movement protestors had little impact and did not go further than heckling the candidates. Occupy Movement members pledged to stage protests in New Hampshire and South Carolina during the presidential nomination process.

Based on the Occupy Washington DC announcement to the media on January 5, 2012, protestors are committed to maintaining a presence in Washington DC for 2012. The Occupy Movement groups in Washington, DC continue to receive donations, private contributions, and assistance from local Washington DC health and safety organizations. Zeese, a political activist with the group, said 2012 is the international year of the co-op, and they would focus on "creating worker-owned co-operatives to provide income to occupiers and funding for the movement." Protestors continue to use social networking media to ask for help and affirm their position to stay at the camps.

On January 26, 2012, Adbusters emailed over 90,000 subscribers to their website and magazine with a message targeting the G8 and NATO summits scheduled for May 2012. The message called for people from all over the world to converge on Chicago and advertise their exploits via the twitter "#OCCUPYCHICAGO."

Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican and Democratic National Conventions. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.

Anti-Capitalism Protests at Wall Street and in Major U.S. Cities

Summary

In July 2011, Canadian activist group Adbusters encouraged viewers of their website to protest against corporate influence and address those responsible for the global banking industry crisis. Adbusters stated, "Beginning from one simple demand – a presidential commission to separate money from politics – we start setting the agenda for a new America." The message was bolstered by the support of internet hacking group Anonymous, who demanded their followers "flood lower Manhattan and occupy Wall Street."

The protestors identified themselves as the "99ers" or "99" and believe 99 percent of Americans share the same amount of wealth as the top one percent. Although many other interests are represented at the sites, the Occupy Movement intends to address the perceived disparity in the nation's wealth through nonviolent protest. Some of the protestors donned Guy Fawkes mask (see Figure 1), in homage to "V is for Vendetta," a movie about political protest against a totalitarian regime. The movie referenced Fawkes, the English political figure involved in a failed assassination plot targeting the King of England in 1605.

The movement has been supported by demonstrators in many other major U.S. cities including Washington, DC. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square in Washington, DC through January 2012.

On December 28, 2011, the National Park Service granted a new permit to members of the Occupy Movement to stay at Freedom Plaza through February 28, 2012. However, the protestors will have to share the space with the National Center for Public Policy Research, a free-market think tank planning pro-capitalist activities to counter the Occupy Movement message in February.

On January 27, 2012, the National Park Service notified protestors they will not be allowed to camp or use temporary structures at either Freedom Plaza or McPherson Square and must vacate the premises before January 30. The flyer, approved after a Congressional meeting on Tuesday, stated, "Although 24/7 demonstration vigils and the use of symbolic temporary structures, including empty tents used as symbols of the demonstration, may be permitted in the park areas, camping and the use of temporary structures for camping is not." Occupy Movement protestors told the media they would not leave quietly.

On January 30, 2012, the National Park Service announced they were pushing back the deadline to cease camping at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

On February 4, 2012, the National Park Service authorized the U.S. Park Police to commence enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square.

Participants

Adbusters is an anti-consumerist and pro-environmental activist group based in Canada. According to their website, they work with a "global network of artists, activists, writers, pranksters, students, educators and entrepreneurs who want to advance the new social activist movement of the information age." Adbusters publishes essays by people such as Bill McKibben, who was arrested by U.S. Park Police in September 2011 for civil disobedience at the White House. Their magazine, titled "Adbusters," has a self-reported circulation of 120,000 and is devoted to challenging consumerism.

In Washington, DC, members of Code Pink protested with demonstrators at Freedom Plaza. The anti-war group added their website and resources to further the Occupy Movement. Code Pink is of record with the USSS and has attempted to infiltrate protected sites and the U.S. Capitol buildings to receive media attention for their anti-war message.

The Occupy Movement in Washington, DC was divided between demonstrators for Occupy DC in McPherson Square and the group in Freedom Plaza under the name "Stop the Machine," which added anti-war and environmental justice demands to the Occupy message. Although both groups attempted to unite under the Occupy Movement, efforts have stagnated due to in-fighting on both sides.

Various labor unions, particularly those in New York City and Washington, DC, pledged support for the Occupy Movement. In New York, members of the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) 1199 – healthcare workers – pledged support while members of the Communication Workers of America and unemployed office building workers from SEIU protested at an Occupy rally in Washington, DC.

The Occupy Movement, especially in New York, received heavy endorsement from entertainment celebrities. Prominent musicians and actors were visible at the rally, provided resources to the protestors, and voiced support for the movement, which proposed the wealthiest tax payers in America are not paying their fair share.

One of the Occupy Movement websites is linked to the blog of political activist Kevin Zeese, a former aide to Ralph Nader, who refuted claims the Occupy Movement is connected to the Democratic Party. Zeese and others have stated politicians and some activist leaders have attempted to co-opt the Occupy Movement message but the protests are not connected.

Other camps across the country were disbanded by city officials; however, the two groups in Washington, DC continue to occupy public space. The group at Freedom Plaza, formerly known as Stop the Machine, changed its name to Occupy Washington, DC. This group is very similar, but not the same as Occupy DC, which occupies McPherson Square.

Following the closure of several Occupy Movement camps, most notably at Zuccotti Park in New York City, more protestors bolstered the ranks at the two locations in Washington, DC.

Timeline

On September 17, 2011, 1,000 people demonstrated during the 66th United Nations General Assembly and in conjunction with the U.S. Day of Rage, a gathering inspired by the Arab Spring to protest the corrupt democratic process in the U.S. Seven people were arrested by the New York City Police Department (NYPD) during their march through the streets of lower Manhattan. Protestors gathered at Zuccotti Park, a privately-owned public area near Wall Street, as a base of operations.

On September 22, 2011, demonstrators connected with a labor union for the first time. They interrupted a Sotheby's Auction in a show of solidarity with the art handler's union that had been locked out. Many other labor unions linked up with protestors.

On September 24, 2011, 80 people were arrested for attempting to force street closures, blocking traffic, and disorderly conduct. Videos of police officer tactics to control the protestors were posted to various internet sites and subjected to scrutiny. Anonymous posted the personal contact information of an officer who pepper sprayed a woman who was offering no visible resistance. The group encouraged followers to contact NYPD and complain about the officer's actions.

On September 30, 2011, 1,000 protestors gathered in Boston in support of the movement.

On October 1, 2011, 700 protestors were arrested when they tried to cross New York's Brooklyn Bridge.

On October 5, 2011, an unspecified number of labor union members gathered to support the movement in both Boston and New York City. Students and large numbers of unaffiliated unemployed joined the protest, resulting in an estimated 15,000 people. At this time, protests started at a number of college campuses across the country.

On October 6, 2011, unspecified numbers of protestors organized at Freedom Plaza in Washington DC under "Stop the Machine." Protestors stated they would occupy the area until the government created a serious jobs program, added an amendment to the Constitution to take "big money" out of elections by repealing the Citizens United Supreme Court decision, and investigated Wall Street bankers that were involved in the financial crisis.

On October 8, 2011, protestors demonstrated at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum in Washington, DC. They were there to protest an exhibit of military unmanned aerial vehicles and drones. The museum temporarily shut down after protestors clashed with security.

On October 9, 2011, 100 members of Occupy DC protested outside the White House. One individual was arrested by USSS/UD for throwing a shoe at an officer.

On October 11, 2011, six protestors were arrested by U.S. Capitol Police for disorderly conduct when they ran into the Hart Building and unfurled protest banners.

On the same day, Boston Police Officers arrested approximately 141 protestors after they refused to vacate a park area located in Boston, MA.

On October 12, 2011, 30 members of Occupy Grand Rapids protested during Vice President Biden's visit to Grand Rapids, Michigan.

On the same day, 11 protestors in San Francisco, California were arrested after blocking the entrance to a Wells Fargo headquarters for five hours.

Groups in many U.S. cities have demonstrated in support of the Occupy Movement.

On October 15, 2011, protestors start a "Global Day of Action" with demonstrations planned in over 80 countries. Riots break out in Rome, Italy and demonstrators clashed violently with police officers. Other protestors in London, England, attempted to occupy the London Stock Exchange.

Thousands more arrived in New York. Several protestors were removed from a Citibank branch at Washington Square Park in New York resulting in the arrests of 20 people.

On the same day, 3,000 people demonstrated in Denver, Colorado. Protestors held up signs calling for the abolition of the Federal Reserve. Twenty three people were arrested when they refused to vacate the state-owned park that served as a meeting ground for the protestors.

Law enforcement made arrest at several more Occupy Movement sites. In Chicago, Illinois, 175 people were arrested and 100 more throughout Arizona.

On October 25, 2011, law enforcement moved to clear the Occupy Oakland site due to escalating concern about sanitation, violence, and crime. Police arrested 102 protestors. One protestor, a former Marine and Iraq War veteran, sustained injuries when he was allegedly hit on the head with a gas canister by police. This incident prompted an apology from local politicians and created a heated national debate about the demonstrations.

On November 2, 2011, an estimated group of 3,000 protestors gathered at the Port of Oakland. The protest was peaceful but the port was closed to operations, due to the congestion around the work area. Open source reporting indicated as many as 30,000 protestors created disturbances in Oakland and San Francisco in an attempt to shut down banks and other businesses.

On November 5, 2011, protestors in Portland, Oregon, started the "Move your $" campaign, where organizers asked participants to remove their assets from several top tier banks and reinvest with local institutions. Around the world, protestors galvanized their presence at Occupy Movement sites and commemorated Guy Fawkes Day - an English holiday, also known as Bonfire Night, celebrating the failure of Guy Fawkes to assassinate the King of England in 1605.

On November 10, 2011, a 35-year old man died at the Occupy Movement site in Burlington, Vermont. Preliminary police investigation indicated the death was a suicide and the man shot himself in his tent. On the same day, a man was shot and killed following a dispute at the Occupy Oakland site, prompting further concerns for safety at Occupy Movement sites around the country.

On November 15, 2011, New York law enforcement served notices to protestors at Zuccotti Park to vacate the area due to health and safety concerns. They were requested to take down their tents and make-shift shelters, adhere to curfews, and relocate to allow the park to be cleaned. Protestors were told they could return to the park after the cleaning without tents or encampment provisions. Many of them left and relocated down the street to Foley Park, intending to return to Zuccotti Park. Around 200 people were arrested.

In response to the raid on Zuccotti Park, the Occupy Wall Street protestors staged a large-scale demonstration in lower Manhattan on Thursday, November 17, with the stated intent of shutting down Wall Street. Threats of violent behavior in retaliation for the raid, some of it directed at law enforcement, spread through the media and viral internet videos. One man was arrested for terrorist statements, stating they would burn down New York City. Demonstrations took place in other cities, including Washington, DC, to show solidarity with the New York protestors.

In Berkeley, California, at the University of California at Davis, several people linked arms at the campus and refused police orders to move and vacate. Protestors were pepper sprayed by police and the video prompted school officials to publically condemn the police action. Following media scrutiny and national debate, the officers responsible for the action were placed on administrative leave. Police officials stated they would investigate the incident.

In December 2011, several Occupy Movement sites were pressured by authorities to disperse or cooperate with more restrictive requirements regarding safety and sanitation concerns.

On December 4, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested 31 protestors in McPherson Square, Washington, DC, for refusing to dismantle a plywood structure they erected just after midnight. Officers removed the protestors and tore down the plywood structure amid public safety concerns by city officials.

On December 7, 2011, around 70 protestors marched to K Street, in protest of the many Washington, DC lobbyist firms in the area, leading to a temporary road closure due to congestion. The Washington Metropolitan Police (MPD) arrested 62 protestors, including one person for misdemeanor assault on a police officer. This was the largest number of arrests since the Occupy DC group secured McPherson Square as their home base in September. The same day, 12 protestors were arrested at the Supreme Court and 11 others, affiliated with American Dream Movement, were arrested for obstructing a public highway.

In December 2011, open source media reported on November 30, two members of Occupy Tampa posed as a couple and wore evening attire to gain entry to a 2012 U.S. presidential candidate Mitt Romney fundraiser at the Tampa Museum of Art. Upon gaining entry, the couple shouted, "Shame, Shame!!" until security forced them to leave. One of the protestors initially resisted and yelled, "Look at this crowd! Multiply it by 3,000. Welcome to the (2012) RNC." Neither was arrested and the protests continued outside the venue.

On December 18, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors after they unsuccessfully attempted to chain themselves to a fence at the White House.

On December 20, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested seven protestors for failure to obey an order following a demonstration with 50 individuals at the White House.

On December 28, 2011, ten protestors were arrested in Des Moines, Iowa outside Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney's campaign office. The protestors demanded Romney and Wells Fargo Bank release their tax returns and return campaign contributions.

On December 30, 2011, U.S. Park Police officers arrested two protestors for wearing masks during a demonstration with nine individuals at the White House.

In late-December 2011, Zuccotti Park was cleared by New York City officials for cleaning. Protestors were allowed back without tents, sleeping bags, and other amenities to stay overnight. Following this mandate, very few protestors attempted to create a presence in the park.

On January 4, 2012, media reports indicated many of the tents erected at Freedom Plaza were left vacant by protestors over the holidays. Some of the remaining protestors told the media cold temperatures and class division led to the decreasing numbers at the site.

Other media reports stated Occupy DC at McPherson Square faces safety and health concerns, not only from the cold temperatures but from numerous sightings of rats. These concerns could force city officials to urge closing of the camp.

On January 5, 2012, Occupy Washington, DC announced to the media they were expanding their efforts in the winter towards a massive "American Spring." This is a reference to the Arab Spring of 2010, in which civil resistance and social networking media were used to topple governments in the Middle East and North Africa. They stated two houses, one in Washington, DC, and one in Maryland, were designated for special projects including the production of an unspecified television show. Protestors mentioned "National Occupation of Washington, DC," scheduled to begin on March 30, 2012, as a combination of music, education, and resistance mobilizing people from across the nation.

On January 17, 2012, approximately 1,500 protestors marched from the U.S. Supreme Court to the White House. Two individuals attempted to jump the fence line before falling back to the ground. Video footage of protestors showed an unknown individual throw a smoke device over the fence. Responders cleared the device and declared the area safe. Two packages were also left unattended and declared safe by responders.

On January 24, 2012, 80 protestors demonstrated near the White House during President Obama's 2012 State of the Union Address.

On January 28, 2012, Occupy Oakland staged a large "move in day" protest. The protestors attempted to "occupy" the vacant Henry J. Kaiser Convention Center and the Oakland Museum of California, but were ordered to disperse and several arrests were made at each site. Later that evening, large crowds gathered outside an Oakland YMCA, where clashes with the Oakland Police Department escalated and officers were pelted with bottles, metal pipes, rocks, spray cans, and burning flares. Officers responded with tear gas and began arresting demonstrators. Around the same time as the YMCA protest, Occupy Oakland demonstrators broke into Oakland City Hall and smashed display cases, graffitied walls, cut electrical wires, and burned an American flag. By the end of the day, approximately 400 protestors were arrested. Occupy Oakland organizers condemned police actions and claim to be organizing a "day of action" against the arrests on February 6, 2012.

As a result of these events, approximately 300 demonstrators in New York City marched in support of Occupy Oakland.

On the same day, hundreds of Occupy DC protestors gathered outside the annual Alfalfa Club dinner in Washington, DC, to demonstrate against the perceived injustices of DC's "power brokers." The protestors heckled guests and threw glitter on Senator Joe Lieberman as he arrived for the dinner.

On January 29, 2012, U.S. Park Police officers were handing out fliers about the January 30th deadline to cease overnight camping in McPherson Square when a male protestor became angry and confronted the officers. One Park Police officer used a Taser to subdue the individual after he would not comply with police orders. The individual was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace after he was taken to George Washington Hospital.

On February 4, 2012, U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of overnight camping restrictions at McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza. Park Police seized any camp equipment found on the site and removed the tents in which the equipment was found.

Inspections were suspended later that day and approximately 25 officers were scheduled to remain overnight and monitor and enforce regulations. U.S. Park Police arrested 11 individuals for failure to obey a lawful order, crossing a police line, resisting arrest, assaulting a police officer, simple assault, and felony assault on a police officer. One Park Police officer was struck in the head with a brick by a protestor and sustained non-life threatening injuries during the operation.

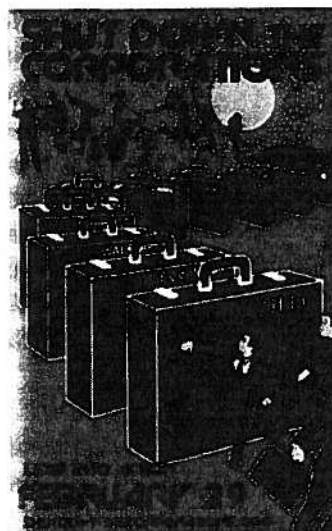

On February 5, 2012, the U.S. Park Police commenced enforcement of camping restrictions at Freedom Plaza. One individual was arrested for threatening a police officer. Park Police scheduled 18 officers to remain overnight to monitor and enforce regulations. No further incidents were reported.

Upon completion of the enforcement action, protestors were allowed to return to McPherson Square and Freedom Plaza.

On February 14, 2012, the FBI advised an Occupy Movement-affiliated event, Shut Down the Corporations, was scheduled to occur nationwide on February 29, 2012. The group's website called for non-violent, direct action against members of the American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) to "reclaim our ability to make the decisions that affect our lives." The group claimed corporations and the government suppressed and silenced their collective voices emphasizing foreclosure, unemployment, lack of health care, and environment destruction. The website lists ALEC member businesses and cities and recommended tactics such as blockades, boycotts, sit-ins, and other types of protest.

The website specifically mentions the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) headquarters located in downtown Washington, DC as a target for direct action.

In March 2012, Occupy Movement websites and open source media reported demonstrations and activities intended to protest major events throughout the year. These specifically mentioned G20+10 Summit, Republican National Convention and Democratic National Convention. Occupy Movement leaders indicated intentions to set up a network to plan and coordinate networking communities.

On March 16, 2012, demonstrators posted on their website that Occupy Department of Education (DOE) was planned as part of the National Occupation of Washington, DC (NOW DC) event scheduled from March 30, 2012 to April 30, 2012. Organizers described the event as a protest against poor public education testing procedures and the threat to national education. Other events listed included social events and artistic festivals. They stated the event would include marches and non-violent direct action.

Conclusion

Demonstrators have protested in nearly every state in America. Open source reporting estimated the largest protests in the U.S. were in Boston (10,000 participants); Washington, DC (3,000); Chicago (8,000); New York City (15,000); Seattle (5,000); and Burlington, Vermont (1,000). Local and national politicians have been pressured by some in the media to act for or against the movement; however, most have avoided making a decisive move against the protestors. The potential shutdown of Occupy DC may be the most difficult. The National Park Service has provided extensions to the permits to protest at Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square through February 2012. Additionally, as many as six DC city council members have stated they believe the protestors should be allowed to stay. If the remaining Occupy protests are shut-down, they may travel and dramatically increase the demonstrations in Washington, DC. Freedom Plaza and McPherson Square could quickly become the epicenter of the Occupy Movement.

As our protectees continue to speak about the economy, wars in Iran and Afghanistan, and healthcare, demonstrators are likely to feel they have a global stage to protest in furtherance of their message. The primary themes of the Occupy Movement are likely to continue through the 2012 U.S. presidential campaign and associated demonstrations may occur at protected sites.

Members of the Occupy Movement claimed they would have a strong presence during the Iowa Republican caucuses on January 3, 2012. Some political pundits speculated the Occupy Movement could generate similar political impact to the Tea Party in 2010. However, media reports indicated the Occupy Movement protestors had little impact and did not go further than heckling the candidates. Occupy Movement members pledged to stage protests in New Hampshire and South Carolina during the presidential nomination process.

On January 26, 2012, Adbusters emailed over 90,000 subscribers to their website and magazine with a message targeting the G8 and NATO summits scheduled for May 2012. The message called for people from all over the world to converge on Chicago and advertise their exploits via the twitter "#OCCUPYCHICAGO." Occupy Movement demonstrators, specifically Students for a Democratic Society, are planning action at high-profile events, such as G8/NATO in Chicago, Illinois and the Republican and Democratic National Conventions. Such information has been disseminated through law enforcement entities.
